Synopsis Books:

Ever since the behavioral work of Lissmann (1958), who showed that the weak electric discharges of some families of fish (hitherto considered useless for prey capture or for scaring away enemies) are part of a strange sensory system, these fish have attracted attention from biologists. The subsequent discovery of the electroreceptors in the skin of gymnotids and mormyrids (Bullock et al. 1961; Fessard and Szabo 1961) and the evidence that the ampullae of Lorenzini of nonelectric sharks and rays are also electro receptors (Digkgraaf and Kalmijn 1962) was a start for a lively branch of physiological, anatomical, and behavioral research. Many findings of general importance for these fields have made the case to which extremes the performance of the central and peripheral nervous systems can be driven. Among those findings is the temporal accuracy of the pacemaker of some high-frequency fish which controls the electric organ, probably the most accurate biological clock (coefficient of variation
